

FILMS AND BOOKS

Nowadays there's a lot of opinions about books, films and film adaptations. Some say books are better, others say movies are better. They find many of reasons why it is so, but we have to disappoint (or delight) all of you: there is no right way.

How can people compare books and film adaptations? It's extremely different pieces of art. We take that some people like watching films and other like reading. That's ok and there's no correct option.

For example, our first character prefers reading. They promise, it's not because it develops imagination, gives knowledge or something like that (but it also may be, of course), just because they are not okay with already done scences. They just like using fantasy and details for all of characters — their behaviour, appearance, thoughts, inner world and anything you can even imagine.

Our second character prefers movies. They like representation, images. It's not because they're lazy (but it also may be, of course), it's just because films are more colorful, eye-catching and attract. They like cast, picture, "Easter eggs" and some details that we can't see in books.

Every person is firstly person with their individual thinking. We, you, director, author and other reader have their own imagination, thinking and that's the main difference between books and films. When you watch some film, you see already done imagine and you don't have a possibility to add something yours. When you read some book, it can be harder to concentrate. But it is also personally.

Films and books are not the same. When you read, you won't feel what you feel when you watch movie and vice versa. Each of these arts deserves respect and its own followers.
