

The essay

Have you ever wondered what important role colours play in our lives? I haven't got the foggiest idea about it until this point, but forsooth it's like a scary thing which can not only replace a million words, but even manage human lives. For instance, this suggestion is aptly proved by the indisputably sensual poem of Oscar Wilde called "Symphony in Yellow".

To begin with, this poem really doesn't leave anyone indifferent after reading it (what I've also faced). I consider that the author uses yellow there for the reason, because colour is the way to convey the mood and feelings, what Oscar Wilde accordingly has succeed in. From my point of view, he describes the yellow shades of the sad season autumn and he's really in some kind of depression. The author is anxious and feels blue to watch everything slowly "die" and the world seems kind of cloudy to him, that's why he feels so lonely and unnecessary among a crowd of people who don't care. In a nutshell, without a doubt, yellow is the colour of sadness, pain and desolation and it's not for nothing there's superstition you shouldn't give yellow flowers due to the fact it can lead to a breakup.

As far as I am concerned, frankly speaking, I don't know what my favourite colour is, but I'll be honest that it has an absolutely colossal impact on how I feel. For instance, a lot of people from my surroundings are of the opinion that black is very suitable for me and it was made just for me. It cannot be denied that I feel very confident thanks to this shade like I'm capable of taking over the whole world. It should be accepted that black is very elegant and makes you especially attractive and dangerous woman at the same time, that's why I am fond of this hue. Therefore, this is my best-loved and I really see and feel a strong energy in it that allures.

In the row of black, I'm also addicted to the pink. This colour encourages me to go bananas and have my head in the clouds. I swear I don't know how it works, but when I dye hair pink, I get a huge coming of inspiration and desire that helps me to make plans and dreams come true. Consequently, pink really turns me into a little girl inside for whom the world is painted in bright colours and inspires hope and faith that I'll definitely achieve success.

However, you know I don't want to blow smoke, so blue colour has the ghost of a chance to become my lovely at least someday owing to the fact that I'll probably like it when the ice freezes. It is said to be "sedative" but it drives me up the wall and I think it's already out of fashion. Thus, there are colours that have not only a positive impact, but can also cause negative emotions and even poor health.

To conclude, I've given vivid examples of how colour becomes something very influencing and salient in our lives. It can express the whole spectrum of emotions at least and at most completely change a person, control and manage his/her life, choice and thoughts. Certainly, if all people realized this idea, they would pay more attention to it. By and large, today is a great day to be about to pull ourselves together, start self-development and add some new colours to our wardrobes and lives in general, so why not start right now?
